PROBABLY A MISTAKE,

A Washington telegram of January

The President has decided to reheve General Crook from his command in Arizons, and will probably be relieved by General Miles within the next week or ten days. General Sheridan has been trying to prevent this, and may yet be able to do so, as he believes General Crook has done everything human power could do to capture the renegade Apaches. He thinks no one could have done any better than Crook, and still considers that officer the ablest leader in Indian warfare in the United States army but the pressure upon the President to trake a change is very strong and comes both from friends of General Miles-who is anxious to try his hand at the job-and the people of Arizona, who have lost confidence in Crook, and have sent any amount of appeals to the president, of both an official and private character. General Sheridan says it is very easy to criticise a man who has been laboring under the disadvatages Crook has been suffering from, and that no one can fully appreciate the difficulties which he has encountered. He thinks that if Crook is let alone he will come out all right in the end, but the President is of the opinion that the General has had a fair chance and should not object to surrendering his command and letting some one else try it. Some of the friends of General Miles say he is making a mistake in seeking Crook's job, as he will not succeed any better, but the stars of a Major-General are to be given away. General Pope retires in a couple of months, and Miles wants a chance to

A MODEL REPORMER.

A few nights since, says an exchange Senators Hampton, Voorbees, Ransom and a friend of the latter, from North Carolina, were sitting around the fire in Washington, talking about offices and civil service reform. Senators Hampton and Voorhees were congratulating the North Carolina senator on his great success in obtaining positions for his friends and the facility which, despite civil service rules, changes had been made in North Carolina.

General Ransom, with the sweet, guile less smile for which he is so famous, replied that in none of the appointments which he had secured had there been the least evasion of civil service reform, and all the appointments were models in that
